Industry awards local designers

ARCHITECTURAL excellence, master builders and a client with a taste for something exciting have combined in The Peninsula to create a building, which is reaping both financial reward and recognition from the industry.

The 36-room boutique resort is confirmed as the jewel in the crown on the Port Douglas Esplanade, after winning a high commendation in the statewide Royal Australian Institute of Architects Awards.

Receiving the award for local architects, Total Project Group Director Roger Mainwood said: "It is particularly flattering to receive an industry-based award which has been judged by our peers statewide.

"We wanted to create a striking building using traditional Queenslander materials, like weatherboards and louvres, but in a contemporary form, whilst including references to the beach side location.

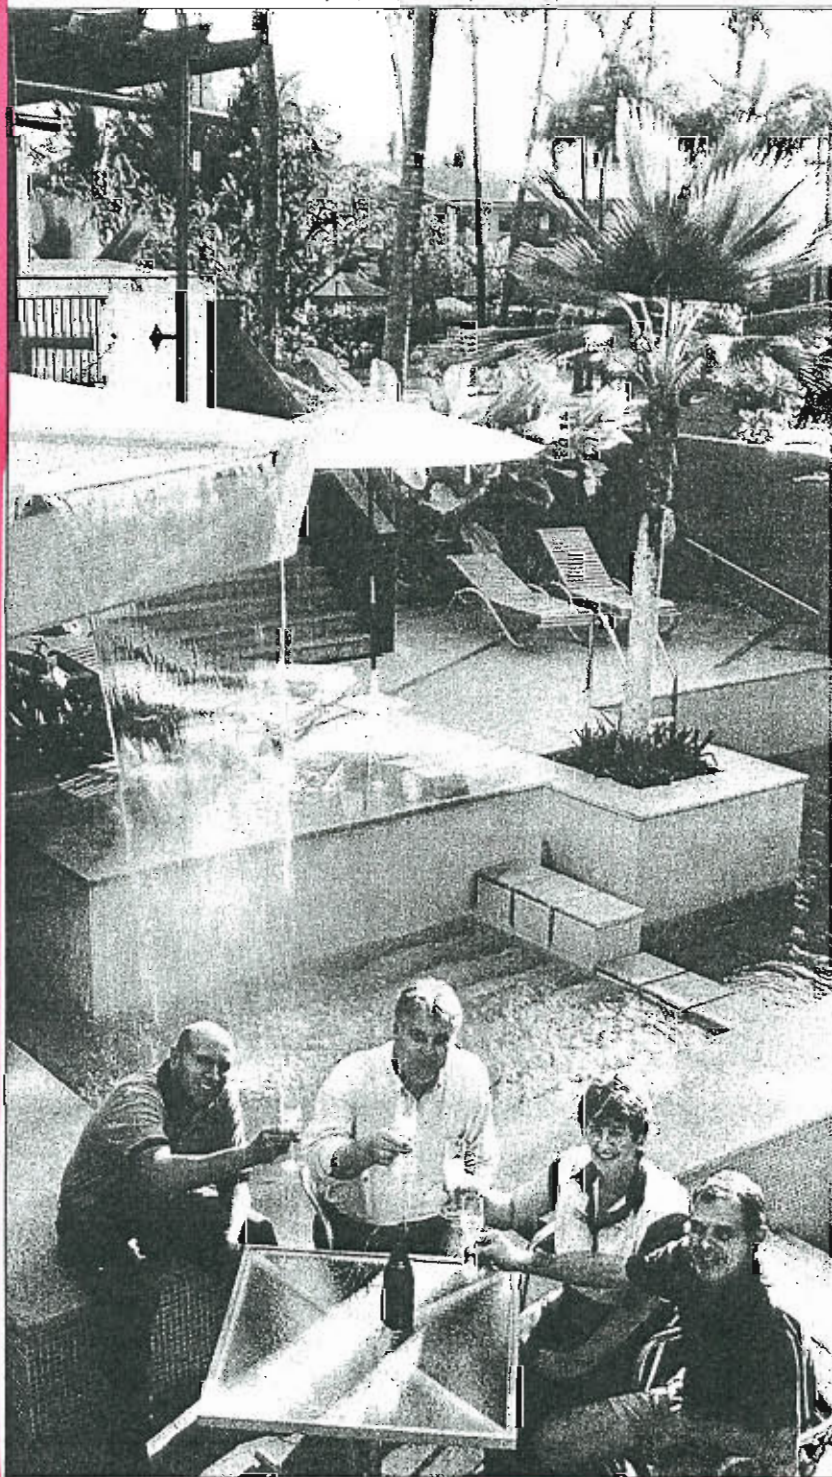

"We were approached by local developers Keith and Janet Mole, who recognised the site's unique value and wanted us to design a building with equally unique appointments and a contemporary elegance."

The judges also appreciated the buildings uniqueness in the way the repetition of similar unit types had been selectively broken to produce "an economical building of richness and complexity with projecting planes directing views toward the Port Douglas headland and ocean beyond, while providing shelter from the south-easterly winds".

The L-shaped site planning embraces the resort's pool and landscaped terraces protecting them from the wind.

The judge's final word was "a design based on a good idea. The differing textures internally and fluid organisation reflects the overall dynamism of the resort".

CHEERS ... Peninsula managers Denis and Trish Batkin toast the award with landscape architect Andrew Prowse and architect Roger Mainwood.
